

(Read free ebook) File size: 47.Mb

Toby's Room

Par Pat Barker
DOC | *audiobook | ebooks |
Download PDF | ePub

Dtails sur le produit Rang parmi les ventes : #167639 dans eBooksPubli le: 2012-08-16Sorti le: 2012-08-16Format: Ebook Kindle

(Read free ebook) Toby's Room

Par Pat Barker : Toby's Room before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Toby's Room:

Download

Read Online

Description :

Prsentation de l'diteurToby's Room is the second novel in Pat Barker's Life Class Trilogy, returning to the First World War in a dark, compelling examination of human desire, wartime horror and the power of friendshipWhen Toby is reported 'Missing, Believed Killed', another secret casts a lengthening shadow over Elinor's world: how exactly did Toby die - and why? Elinor determines to uncover the truth. Only then can she finally close the door to Toby's room. Moving from the Slade School of Art to Queen Mary's Hospital, where surgery and art intersect in the rebuilding of the shattered faces of the wounded, Toby's Room is a riveting drama of identity, damage, intimacy and loss - this is Pat Barker's most powerful novel yet.'Heart-rending return to the Great War . . . On every level, Toby's Room anatomises a world where extreme emotion shatters the boundaries of identity, behaviour, gender. Through the mask of Apollo bursts an omnipresent Dionysus' Independent'Once again Barker skilfully moves between past and present, seamlessly weaving fact and fiction into a gripping narrative' Sunday Telegraph'A gripping and moving exploration of the lasting effects of war' Woman Home'A natural storyteller... the reader [will be] torn between wanting to linger over the sheer pleasure of the writing and the desire to rush towards the end to discover how it all pans out' Daily Mail

Other titles in the trilogy:Life ClassNoondayExtrait

1 Elinor arrived home at four o'clock on Friday and went straight to her room. She hung the red dress on the wardrobe door, glancing at it from time to time as she brushed her hair. That neckline seemed to be getting lower by the minute. In the end her nerve failed her. She hunted out her pink dress, the one she used to wear for dancing classes at school, put it on, and stood in front of the cheval mirror. She turned her head from side to side, her hands smoothing down the creases that had gathered round the waist. Oh dear. No, no, she couldn't do it, not this time, not ever again. She wriggled out of it and threw it to the back of the wardrobe. Out of the window would have been more satisfying, but her father and brother-in-law were sitting on the terrace. She pulled the red dress over her head, tugged the neckline up as far as it would go, and went reluctantly downstairs. Father met her in the hall and hugged her as if he hadn't seen her for a year. Outside the living room, she hesitated, but there was no point wearing a red dress and then creeping along the skirting boards like a mouse, so she flung the door open and swept in. She kissed Rachel, waved at Rachel's husband, Tim, who was at the far side of the room talking to her mother, and then looked around for Toby, but he wasn't there. Perhaps he wasn't coming after all, though he'd said he would. The prospect of his absence darkened the whole evening; she wasn't sure she could face it on her own. But then, a few minutes later, he came in, apologizing profusely, damp hair sticking to his forehead. He must've been for a swim. She wished she'd known; she'd have gone with him. Not much hope of talking to him now; Mother had already beckoned him to her side. Rachel was asking Elinor question after question about her life in London, who she met, who she went out with, did she have any particular friends? Elinor said as little as possible, looking for an excuse to get away. It was supplied by her mother, who appeared at her side and hissed, Elinor, go upstairs at once and take that ridiculous dress off. At that moment the gong sounded. Elinor spread her hands, all injured innocence, though underneath she felt hurt and humiliated. Yet again, she was being treated like a child. Father came in at the last minute just as they were sitting down. She wondered at the curious mixture of poking and prying and secrecy that ruled their lives. Mother and Father saw very little of each other. She needed country air for the sake of her health; he lived at his club because it was such a convenient walking distance from the hospital, where he often had to be available late at night. Was that the reason for their weeklong separation? She doubted it. Once, crossing Tottenham Court Road, she'd seen her father with a young woman, younger even than Rachel. They'd just come out of a restaurant. The girl had stood, holding her wrap tightly round her thin shoulders, while Father flagged down a cab and helped her into it, and then they were whirled away into the stream of traffic. Elinor had stood and watched, open-mouthed. Father hadn't seen her; she was sure of that. She'd never mentioned that incident to anyone, not even to Toby, though she and Toby were the only members of the family who kept no secrets from each other. She sat in virtual silence for the first half of the meal sulking, her mother would have said though Tim did his clumsy best to tease her out of it. Did she have a young man yet? Was all this moodiness because she was in love? There's no time for anything like that, Elinor said, crisply. They work us too hard. Well, you know what they say, don't you? All work and no play...? He turned to Toby. Have you seen her with anybody? Not yet, but I'm sure it's only a matter of time. Toby's joining in the teasing, however reluctantly, was all it took to chafe Elinor's irritation into fury. Well, if you must know I have met somebody. She plucked a name from the air. Kit Neville. This was not true: she'd hardly spoken to Kit Neville. He was merely the loudest, the most self-confident, the most opinionated, and, in many ways, the most obnoxious male student in her year, and therefore the person she thought of first. What does he do? Mother asked. Predictably. He's a student. What sort of student? Art. What else would he be doing at the Slade? Have you met his family? Now why on earth would I want to do that? Because that's what people do when they're about to get engaged? Well, I'm not. We're just friends. Very good friends, but...friends. You need to be careful, Elinor, Rachel said. Living in London on your own. You don't want to get a reputation...I do want to get a reputation, as it happens. I want to get a reputation as a painter. You know what I mean. Oh, for heavens sake. Elinor, her father said. That's enough. So even Father was turning against her. The last mouthful of cheese and biscuit sticking in her dry throat, Elinor followed her mother and Rachel out of the dining room. They sat over a pot of coffee that nobody wanted, staring at their reflections in the black windows that overlooked the airless terrace. The windows couldn't be opened because of moths.

Rachel had a horror of moths. So who is this Mr. Neville? Mother asked. Nobody, hes in my year, thats all. I thought you said classes werent mixed? Some are, some arent. She could barely speak for exasperation; shed brought this on herself. Look, its not as if were going out... So why mention him? Rachels voice was slurry with tiredness. Tendrils of damp hair stuck to her forehead; shed eaten scarcely anything. She yawned and stretched her ankles out in front of her. Look at them. Puddings. She dug her fingers into the swollen flesh as if she hated it. You must be worn out in this heat, Mother said. Why dont you put your feet up? Feet up in the drawing room? Unheard of. But then Elinor intercepted a glance between the two women, and understood. She wondered when she was going to be told. What a family they were for not speaking. She wanted to jump on the table and shout out every miserable little secret they possessed, though, apart from the breakdown of her parents marriage, she couldnt have said what the secrets were. But there was something: a shadow underneath the water. Swim too close and youd cut your feet. A childhood memory surfaced. On holiday somewhere, shed cut her foot on a submerged rock; shed felt no pain, only the shock of seeing her blood smoking into the water. Toby had taken off his shirt and wrapped it round her foot, then helped her back to the promenade. She remembered his pink fingers, wrinkled from the sea, the whorl of hair on the top of his head as he bent down to examine the cut. Why couldnt they leave her alone? All this nonsense about young men... It was just another way of drilling it into you that the real business of a girls life was to find a husband. Painting was, at best, an accomplishment; at worst, a waste of time. She was trying to hold on to her anger, but shed suppressed it so long it was threatening to dissipate into depression. As it so often did. Why hadnt Toby spoken up for her? Instead of just sitting there, fiddling with his knife and fork. She was thoroughly fed up. As soon as possible after the men joined them, she excused herself, saying she needed an early night. As she closed the door behind her, she heard Father ask, Whats the matter with her? Oh, you know, Mother said. Girls. Meaning? Nothing that made her feel better about herself, or them. Next morning after breakfast Toby announced that he was going to walk to the old mill. In this heat? Mother said. Its not too bad. Anyway, itll be cooler by the river. Elinor followed him into the hall. Do you mind if I come? Its a long way. Toby, I walk all over London. Dont let Rachel hear you say that. Rep-utation! They arranged to meet on the terrace. Soon Elinor was following her brother across the meadow, feeling the silken caress of long grasses against her bare arms and the occasional cool shock of cuckoo spit. You know this chap you were talking about last night...? Oh, dont you start. I was only asking. I only mentioned him because Im sick of being teased. I just wanted to get Tim off my back. Instead of which, I got Mother onto it. And Rachel. Shes worse than Mother. Shes jealous, thats all. She settled down a bit too early and... Well, she didnt exactly get a bargain, did she? You dont like Tim, do you? Hes harmless. I just dont think shes very happy. He turned to face her. You wont make that mistake, will you? Marrying Tim? Shouldnt think so. No-o. Settling down too early. I dont intend to settle down at all. She hoped that was the end of the subject, but a minute later Toby said, All the same, there has to be a reason you mentioned him. I mean, him, rather than somebody else. Hes perfectly obnoxious, thats why. He was just the first person who came to mind. Once they reached the river path, there was some shade at last, though the flashing of sunlight through the leaves and branches was oddly disorientating, and more than once she tripped over a root or jarred herself stepping on air. Be easier coming back, Toby said. We wont have the sun in our eyes. She didnt want to go on talking. She was content to let images rise and fall in her mind: her lodgings in London, the Antiques Room at the Slade, the friends she was starting to make, the first few spindly shoots of independence, though it all seemed a little unreal here, in this thick heat, with dusty leaves grazing the side of her face and swarms of insects making a constant humming in the green shade. She was walking along, hardly aware of her surroundings, when a sudden fierce buzzing broke into her trance. Toby caught her arm. Bluebottles, gleaming sapphire and emerald, were glued to a heap of droppings in the center of the path. A few stragglers zoomed drunkenly towards her, fastening on her eyes and lips. She spat, batting them away. Here, this way, Toby said. He was holding a branch for her so she could edge past the seething mass. Fox? she asked, meaning the droppings. Badger, I think. Theres a sett up there. She peered through the trees, but couldnt see it. Do you remember we had a den here once? he said. She remembered the den: a small, dark, smelly place under some rhododendron bushes. Tiny black insects crawled over your skin and fell into your hair. I dont think it was here. It was. You could just hear the weir. She listened, and sure enough, between the trees, barely audible, came the sound of rushing water. Youre right, I remember now. I thought it was a bit farther on. She thought he might want to go there, he lingered so long, but then he turned and walked on. The river was flowing faster now, picking up leaves and twigs and tiny, struggling insects and whirling them away, and the trees were beginning to thin out. More and more light reached the path until, at last, they came out into an open field that sloped gently down towards the weir. A disused mill the target of their walk stood at the waters edge, though it was many years since its wheel had turned. This had been the forbidden place of their childhood. They were not to go in there, Mother would say. The floorboards were rotten, the ceilings liable to collapse at any minute... And dont go near the water, shed call after them, in a last desperate attempt to keep them safe, as they walked away from her down the drive. We wont, theyd chorus. Promise, Toby would add, for good measure, and then they would glance sideways at each other, red-faced from trying not to giggle. Now, Elinor thought, they probably wouldnt bother going in, but Toby went straight to the side window, prised the boards apart, and hoisted himself over the sill. After a seconds hesitation Elinor followed. Blindness, after the blaze of sunlight. Then, gradually, things became clear: old beams, cobwebs, tracks of childrens footprints on the dusty floor. Their own footprints? No, of course not, couldnt be, not after all these years. Other children came here now. She put her foot next to one of the prints, marveling at the difference in size. Toby, meanwhile, was expressing amazement at having to duck to avoid the beams. Because this place had been the scene of so many forbidden adventures, an air of excitement still clung to it, in spite of the dingy surroundings. She went across to the window and peered out through a hole in the wall. I wonder what it was like to work here. Toby came across and stood beside her. Pretty good hell, I should think. Noise and dust. He was right, of course; when the wheel turned the whole place must have shook. She turned to him. What do you think? He grabbed her arms and pulled her towards him. Crushed against his chest, hardly able to breathe, she laughed and struggled, taking this for the start of some childish game, but then his lips fastened onto hers with a groping hunger that shocked her into stillness. His tongue thrust between her lips, a strong, muscular presence. She felt his chin rough against her cheek, the breadth of his chest and shoulders, not that round, androgynous, childish softness that had sometimes made them seem like two halves of a single person. She started to struggle again, really struggle, but his hand came up and cupped her breast and she felt herself softening, flowing towards him, as if something hard and impacted in the pit of her stomach had begun to melt. And then, abruptly, he pushed her away. Im sorry. Im sorry. Sorry, sorry... She couldnt speak. How was it possible that anybody, in a single moment, could stumble into a chasm so deep there was no getting out of it? Look, you go back, he said. Ill come home later. Automatically, she turned to go, but then remembered the river and turned back. No, go on, Ill be all right, he said. Theyll wonder whats happened if I show up on my own. Revue de presse Unforgettable. . . . Tobys Room takes large risks . . . and it succeeds brilliantly. The New York Times Book Breathtakingly good. . . . Barker has written extensively about the Great War . . . yet shes still coming at it in fresh, powerful ways. This is a writer truly at the height of her powers, and its a dizzying height indeed. The Toronto Star Barker has shown again that she is not only a fine chronicler of war but of human nature. The Independent (London) Haunting and complicated sibling love is at the heart of [this] novel. . . . The precision of Ms. Barkers writing shows her again to be one of the finest chroniclers of . . . the First World War. The Wall Street Journal Gripping and majestic. The Daily Beast Tobys Room takes large risks. Its dark, painful and indelibly grotesque, yet its also tender. It strains against its own narrative control to create, in the midst of ordinary life, a kind of deformed reality precisely to illustrate how everything we call ordinary is disfigured by war. And it succeeds brilliantly. The New York Times Book Tobys Room is the most emotionally powerful and aesthetically daring of her searing about the First World War and British culture. The Times Literary Supplement (London) An enthralling and uplifting read. Ms. Barkers fans will hope that, as with the Regeneration trilogy, a third installment is to follow. The Economist Barker is peerless at evoking the atmosphere of the trenches and of wartime London. The Washington Post Unsparing and rigorous. . . . For Barker, the wounded faces of the soldier-victims are realities, and also emblems of what must never be forgotten or evaded about war, and must continue in her plain, steady, compelling voice to be turned into art. The Guardian (London) Barkers writing is subtle and nuanced, even as it is unsentimental in showing the physical and emotional effects of the war. Her mixture of sensitivity and bluntness made her Regeneration trilogy of the 1990s a remarkable work. The Philadelphia Inquirer This is a powerful book. . . . Barker triumphs. San Francisco Chronicle Excellent. . . . Truly gripping. . . . Miss Barkers prose shines. . . . Will there be a sequel? I hope so. Corinna Lothar, The Washington Times No one evokes England in all its stiff-upper-lip gritty wartime privation like Barker. She is . . . determined to render an honest portrayal of war. She will not allow us to sweep it out of sight. The Miami Herald Difficult to put down. . . . Barker is so deft handling history, from battlefield scenes to surgery in Queen's Hospital, that she has few peers. The Plain Dealer